Xerxes

1973, Kurt Heuser, https://boardgamegeek.com/boardgame/6706

The game is played on the following board,

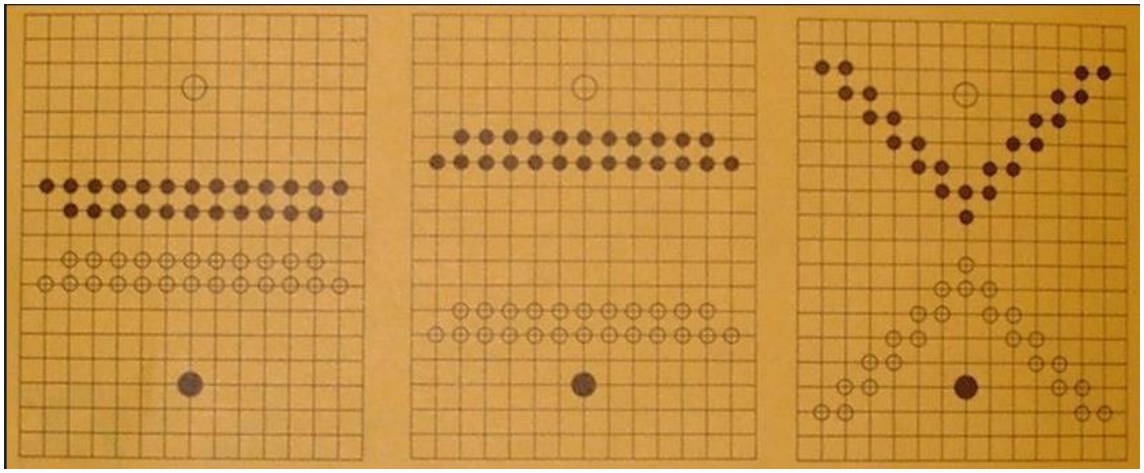

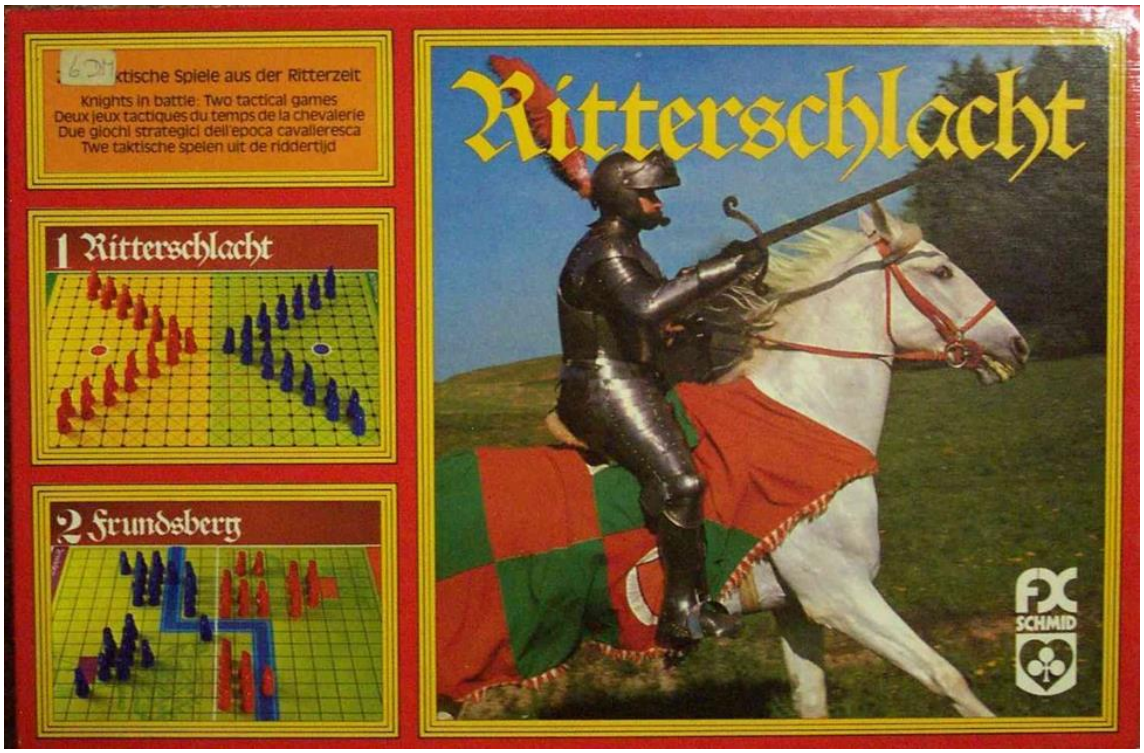

On his turn, the player either:

- move one of their pieces to an adjacent empty space, occupying one of the intersections next to where it is currently located. This can be done forward, backward, or diagonally. Pieces are always placed on the intersections formed between the lines.
- jump with one of their pieces in a straight line over another piece if the space behind it is empty. The player can make as many consecutive jumps with the same piece as they can, but it is not mandatory. After making a jump, they do not have to continue in the same direction; they can jump in another direction if the requirements (free space and adjacent piece) are met. You can jump over your own or enemy pieces. If you jump over an enemy piece, that piece is removed from the board (killed in combat). During the jump action, you can jump over the same piece multiple times, and even pass over the same space multiple times.

Goal: The game ends when a player reaches the enemy camp (circle marked on the board) with a piece. That player wins the battle.

There are three different setups:

the game is also known as Ritterschlacht
